A public offer of shares, on a company-by-company basis, was not considered in order to avoid the risk of underpricing or over-pricing since most of the public sector companies were largely unfamiliar to the investment market. In addition, such a large scale sale of public sector shares would have adversely affected the share prices of the existing companies. It was, thus, decided to off-load the shares to the mutual funds and institutional investors so as to act as a buffer between the Government and the stock market. The institutions would gradually off-load these shares into the open market so as to finally ensure a wider holding of the ownership of these shares.
